RUGER SINGLE SIX & COLT FRONTIER SCOUT IN .22 MAGNUM

by Jimmy C.

Ruger introduced the Single Six in 1953. They were chambered in .22 Long Rifle with a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ " barrel. The frames and cylinders were made of blued steel. The earliest production guns had a "flat gate" to cover the rear of the cylinder. The flat loading gate was changed to the contoured form fitting gate in 1957.

In 1956 Ruger Long Rifle with a the Lightweight The first "Trianodized in a anodized with introduced their "Lightweight" series in .22 4 5/8" barrel. Over a period of three years series expanded to three major variations. Color consisted of an aluminum frame clear grey finish and aluminum cylinder Martin Hardcoating which resulted in a straw color. The second variation still had the aluminum frame and cylinder but anodized all black. The third variation had the black aluminum frame with a blued steel cylinder. All of these guns had a blade front sight and a rear sight that could be adjusted right or left but had no elevation adjustment.

In 1955 Colt reintroduced the Single Action Army. In 1957 they introduced the Colt Frontier Scout in .22 Long Rifle with a 4 ¾" barrel. The Frontier Scouts had aluminum frames with steel cylinders. The frames were left "in the white" while the cylinders and barrels were blued. These revolvers are known by collectors as "duotone" with production lasting trough 1961. The first 15,210 guns had a "Q" suffix in the serial number before it was changed to an "F" suffix because the "Q" looked like a "0". Beginning in 1958 the all blue model with an anodized blue frame was introduced and remained the standard finish through the last revolver in 1971. The front sight was a blade while the rear sight was a notch cut in the grooved top strap over the cylinder, much like the rear sight on the Single Action Army. In 1958 Colt introduced the Frontier Scout Buntline Special with a 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ " barrel, again shortly after their introduction of the Single Action Army Buntline Special.

Shortly after Colt began producing the Frontier Scout they introduced two additional series of revolvers identical in design, size and shape of the Frontier Scout. One was nickel plated with wood grips and a "K" suffix to the serial number the other, the "Frontier Scout '62" with a "P" suffix to the serial number had a black epoxy painted frame and a blued steel cylinder and barrel with plastic "stag" grips. The frames and grip frames of both series were made of Zamac 3 an alloy of zinc and aluminum, weighing approximately the same as a steel frame. Production of both of these series ended in 1970. Since the diameter of the bullet in the .22 Magnum round is approximately .007 larger than the .22 Long Rifle bullet the barrel had to be changed to accommodate the larger round. As a result both Ruger and Colt had to rework their .22 Long Rifle revolvers to handle the new round.

Ruger introduced their .22 Magnum Single Six in 1959. It was fitted with a 6 1/2" barrel. The cylinder was fluted and the rear of the cylinder did not have a firing pin groove. The cylinder was not marked with a serial number. The left side of the frame under the cylinder is marked "WIN. .22 RF MAG. CAL." In 1969 Ruger offered to add a .22 Long Rifle cylinder to any of their .22 Magnum Single Six revolvers for $12.00. Along with that offer was a warning that a .22 Magnum cylinder should not be fitted in a revolver that was marked for the .22 Long Rifle cartridge due to the difference in bullet diameter.

Colt also introduced their .22 Magnum to all three of their Frontier Scout series in 1959. They used the same frame and cylinder combinations as with the .22 Long Rifle revolvers. The magnum cylinders were fluted and did not have the firing pin groove. The cylinders were not serial numbered and were not marked for caliber. After a short production run the muzzle of the barrel was changed from flat to crowned as an aid in manufacturing to ensure the magnum bored barrel was properly

COLT FRONTIER SCOUT .22 MAGNUM

In 1961 Ruger introduced the Single Six Convertible. These guns were like the earlier steel frame Single Six guns but with a second, .22 Magnum cylinder. The frames were marked on the left side under the cylinder ".22 CAL". There were four different barrel lengths, 4 5/8", 5 ½", 6 ½" and 9 ½". Production continued until 1973.

issue until 1964.

RUGER SINGLE SIX CONVERTIBLE Colt introduced their dual cylinder Frontier Scout, Nickel Frontier Scout and Frontier Scout '62 in 1964. They changed the caliber marking on the barrel to ".22 CAL" regardless of the revolver being shipped with both cylinders or only the .22 Long Rifle cylinder. The first dual cylinder Buntline wasn't introduced until 1971. The last Frontier Scout all

In 1964 Ruger introduced the Super Single Six. For the first time a .22 Long Rifle/.22 Magnum Single Action Revolver was available with adjustable sights. It was produced with either a 5 ½" or 6 ½" barrel. Approximately 200 were produced with a 4 5/8" barrel due to an error on the part of a worker in the Ruger factory. While drilling holes in the barrels for front sights, he drilled through into the bore. The barrels were cut off, re-drilled and put into production. Production of the Super Single Six lasted to 1973 when the design of all Ruger Single Action Revolvers was changed to "two screw" with introduction of the transfer bar. (That is a whole story on it's own!) (continued on next page)

COTTALLOU NUU HATU

Colt introduced their Peacemaker and New Frontier in 1970. The Peacemaker frame was like the Frontier Scout but in steel with a casehardened finish. The New Frontier resembled the center fire New Frontier but of the smaller Peacemaker size. They were issued with the .22 Long Rifle cylinder or with both the .22 Long Rifle and .22 Magnum cylinders. The first 25,000 cylinders were fluted before production changed to round cylinders for the .22 Magnum. The apparent explanation for the unfluted cylinders was to aid in identification during manufacturing. Both cylinders were marked for caliber, .22 L.R. or .22 MAG. The first 99,999 revolvers had a "G" prefix with the serial number. Colt did not have a serial number stamp with the additional digit for the 100,000 so between March and September 1974 the Serial numbers were changed to "L" which looked like a "1". After 23,900 revolvers were issued, the stamp was fixed and the "G" returned.

Production ended in 1976.

Ruger did not begin using unfluted .22 Magnum cylinders until the New Model Single Six with the transfer bar in 1973. (Among collectors the New Model is referred to as the "two Screw" model.) This model is still in production.

If you like the .22 Magnum you can have it either old or new and in Ruger or Colt. Your choice, just don't try to put a .22 Magnum cylinder in a revolver (Ruger or Colt) marked for .22 Long Rifle.

Wes B., 1927 ~ 2015

In June, we lost a truly outstanding member, Wes Bisbing. Wes married Hope C. in 1961 and they moved to Utah where he worked for Thiokol as an engineer on the Minuteman missile system. In addition to his deep interest in flare guns, Wes loved all sorts of mechanical devices, including motorcycles, antique automobiles and trains. He was a volunteer locomotive mechanic at the Golden Spike National Historic Site. Health issues prevented Wes and Hope from attending our shows in the last year or two, but their many friends and admirers always ask about them and remark about what a lovely couple they are and how much people enjoyed the amazing and unique displays that Wes and Hope always brought. Wes is survived by his wife, Hope, and step-son, John. Per Wes's request, his cremated remains were scattered somewhere in the Utah or Idaho mountains. He will be missed by us all.

"Living History" members of the Utah Gun Collectors Association are proud to announce a special salute to the American Soldier throughout History.

Fourteen time periods of American Military History will be displayed where one can visibly see the evolution of the American Military uniform, equipment, and weapons.

Living History members will be at most displays in full uniforms to interpret and help bring their time period alive for kids and adults. Rarely can one witness such a display covering America's entire Military History. Don't miss this opportunity to learn and experience our history and help salute those who have sacrificed for the freedoms we all enjoy today.
